

Putting limits on Satellite Radio broadcasts is nothing less than censorship. I rely on my satellite radio since conventional broadcast stations do not cover where I live nor provide the type of broadcast programming I enjoy during my long commutes to work. My experience with XM radio has expanded both mine and my children's musical interests. I cannot see how the local radio stations can feel threatened by traffic and weather reports. Listening to radio station downlinks from traffic helicopters I know just how accurate those traffic reports can be. How can you give a traffic report that is going to be an hour away? Personally I rarely use the traffic and weather reports but I sometimes do just to see what the weather is like around the country, and I never need the traffic reports. If local radio (and TV) stations can't keep up with competition then they need to improve their product, not make the competition illegal.
